Questions 47-50

Black-faced spoonbills, one of the most famous bird species that migrate to Taiwan, are extremely rare and precious. Recently, conservation efforts have been carried out to preserve this endangered species. It is estimated that more than 400 black-faced spoonbills winter in the southern part of Taiwan. Each year, black-faced spoonbills begin migrating to the mouth of the Tsen-wen River in Chi-gu around the beginning of October. Then from the end of November to the beginning of December, the number of birds there reaches a peak.

Scientists observed that adult black-faced spoonbills bring their babies along and arrive for their winter stay as a family unit. However, when it's time to return north during March of the following year, the parents leave the baby birds behind. These baby spoonbills will stay too will fly north on their own and reunite with the adults. These observations suggest that Taiwan is a critical wintering site in the migration and life cycle of this species. That's why a group of people founded the Black-faced spoonbill Conservation Association in order to protect the birds from industrial pollution. The goal of this association is to make Chi-gu a permanent winter home for them and to promote research and conservation of this rare feathered treasure.

47. What is this article mainly about?

- (A) The importance of conserving the black-faced spoonbills.
- (B) Why black-faced spoonbills are becoming endangered.
